Short Poems are Scary!

An Upper KS2 Activity by David Harmer

Be Very Afraid

Be very afraid of the Spotted Pyjama Spider which disguises itself as a spot on the sleeve of your nightwear, waits till you fall asleep, then commences its ominous creep towards your face.

Be very afraid of the Hanging Lightcord Snake which waits in the dark for your hand to reach for the switch, then wraps itself round your wrist with a venomous hiss. Be afraid, very afraid, of the Toothpaste Worm which is camouflaged as a stripe of red in the paste you squeeze and oozes on to your brush with a wormy guile to squirm on your smile.

Be very afraid indeed of the Bookworm Bat which wraps itself like a dustjacket over a book, then flaps and squeaks on your face when you take a look. Be afraid of the Hairbrush Rat, of the Merit Badge Beetle, of the Bubble Bath Jellyfish and the Wrist Watch Tick (with its terrible nip) or the Sock Wasp, of the Bee in the Bonnet (camouflaged as the amber jewel in the hatpin on it). Be afraid of the Toilet Roll Scorpion, snug as a bug in its cardboard tube until someone disturbs it, of the Killer Earring Ant, dangling from a lobe until someone perturbs it. Don’t be brave —

be very afraid.

Introducing the surreal into the everyday can really spark children’s imaginations. This activity looks to generate lots of ideas and then shape them using short poem forms or through creating nonsense verse monsters.

At night our classroom comes alive!
Generate a discussion with the class. What happens at night in your classroom? Do the tables run about on their legs? Do they dance with the chairs? Can they talk? How loud are they? What happens when books fly around? Are the exercise books different flying creatures from the hardbacked books? Do maths books fly in patterns? In circles? In triangles? In squares? Do the numbers in books run out and start to count each other? What happens if someone comes in? Does all this chaos stop very sharply or do they carry on?

This discussion will generate lots of ideas. The challenge is to focus them. Here’s a small frame to get things started.

The tables are...
My reading book flies...
The rulers are marching...
Pointy pencils...
Paint brushes are...
Look out, it’s...

This idea can be extended by asking children to flesh out each line with a simile or description.

The tables are walking down the corridor
Like a long wooden caterpillar

Another possible pattern is to give each line a number, so that it reads:

One table is...
Two books are...
Three pointy pencils are...

Another pattern is based on alliteration and parts of speech. The sequence is adjective, noun, verb, adverb, all using alliteration.

Tall tables totter terribly
Big books bounce...
Pointy pencils...

And so on.

The whole school comes alive
To add variety to the exercise, or to expand it further ask your children to consider all the bats and balls in the PE store, the cleaners’ buckets and mops, the caretaker’s ladders, hammers and screwdrivers. Do they come alive too?

The same ideas can be used with a long list of household objects, clothes and jewellery. All you have to do is give them the power to move and make noises. This is a good way into using personification in poems, so that objects, the weather, trees, and so on come alive and speak.

Short poetry forms
By Year Six it is reasonable to ask the children to try their hand at the following formal structures. However, these syllable counts should never be seen as hard and fast rules. There is nothing to stop children using the model poem as a source of ideas for short, snappy poems of three, seven and five lines that don’t worry about syllable counts. Just using the line as a measure can be enough, especially if the children are encouraged to use simile, metaphor, alliteration and onomatopoeia. Again, Carol Ann Duffy’s poem can act as a model for ideas, but obviously these forms can be used in many different contexts.

Try using haiku, tanka and cinquains to shape the ideas that came out of your class discussion.
Tanka have five lines; the first three are of five-seven-five syllables like a haiku, then the last two lines have seven syllables. For example:

Bedroom curtains flap
The wings of some giant bird
Trapped inside my house.
One day it will fly at me
And frighten me half to death.

Cinquains are arranged in five lines with a sequence of two, four, six, eight, two syllables. The last line is often used to add impact to the poem. For example:

Curtains
Slapping, flapping
Giant wings open wide
A monster bird inside my room
Scares me.

Kennings are the basis of Anglo-Saxon riddles. They describe something, usually in two words (with the second ending in ---er or ---ers), but don’t name it.

Using kennings you can ask your class to take Carol Ann Duffy’s idea of bringing objects to life but make it shorter. Students can create a list poem of kennings, all describing an object. For example:

Pyjamas
Sleep charmers
Spider fighters
Cosy keepers
Leg monsters
Dream bakers

or

Toothpaste
Tooth gleamer
Gum scrubber
Spit frother
Smile shiner
Breath minter

Both these examples are based on words taken from the model poem. It is quite a rigid form but a great way to present everyday things (and people) in imaginative ways as Carol Ann Duffy does.
Nonsense monsters
In a sense, this technique is reversing the process Carol Ann Duffy uses. She takes ordinary things and turns them into monsters; this process invents a monster and puts it in an ordinary place. The following steps help students to create a nonsense creature.

1. Choose an adjective or descriptive phrase, for example: two-headed, slippery, slimy, three-toed, red, green, slinky, smelly, stinky.

2. Choose a creature, for example: worm, beetle, spider, fly, slug, snail, moth, creepy-crawly, dragon, monster, crab, shark, flea, bat, toad.

3. Choose a verb, for example: clings, hangs, wobbles, stinks, crawls, flies, hovers, flaps, stalks, screeches, squeaks.

With these you can create your own ‘Be afraid of...’ poems. For example:

Be afraid of
The three-toed, stinky wombat
That creeps over your bedroom carpet.

Be afraid of
The tiny, slimy slug
Crawling down your curtain.

To develop this, take each of the nouns and give them a designation, e.g. the carpet slug, the wallpaper wombat, the bathroom dragon, the wheelie-bin shark and so on.

Be afraid of
The wheelie-bin shark
Chomping your rubbish

Watch out for
The sock-swallowing lobster
That rattles your wardrobe door.

Extending this idea
Finally, if you are really brave, make up some class lists of revolting nonsense monsters and then put them round the classroom.

Now try this
Other supernatural poems, monster poems and nonsense poems can be used for gathering ideas.
